Manjari Mehta
Dr. Mehta is a social anthropologist and independent researcher who has worked on a range of mountain development issues, including social/gender analysis and training with reference to disaster preparedness and management, rural livelihoods diversification and poverty reduction, and micro-credit and community-based water projects. Her present research focuses on communities in the low and middle hills of Uttarakhand that are increasingly peri-urban in nature, no longer pursuing rural livelihoods but still a far remove from being urban in terms of the insecurity of their footholds in the urban-based economy. She has recently finished working on a book revisiting research in the lower Himalayan region of Tehri Garhwal in light of the tremendous changes that have been brought about by economic liberalisation over the past two decades. She lives in Dehra Dun, Uttarakhand, in India.
